Detail Stickers

All cars from the factory originally had part tags. Over the years rain, snow and restoration have removed most of them. These paper tags were used to identify the part or assembly to the factory line worker. The worker read the build sheet and installed the corresponding part or option on the car. Usually, tags were placed on parts that were an option or group of options. For example on the frame; you could have a hardtop, convertible or 4 doors, so the frame was marked for identification. Many parts came as assemblies such as rear axle, steering column, disc or drum brakes, and master cylinder & booster assemblies; these assemblies also had identification tags. When a car came from the factory the tag could be seen anywhere on the part, sometimes not even visible or straight. These tag sets are compiled from original build sheets using the most common options and components. The build sheet is the finger print of the car, and since no 2 cars are exactly the same, either are the build sheets. A 1969 GTO could have one of 12 coil spring combinations depending on the engine, transmission, and handling package. The rear end could be one of 17, depending on ratio and options. These sets are made up using the most common options and are not intended to be an exact match to any particular car.

Concourse Detail Decals

Sets include; brake & fuel line tags, shock and spring tags, brake cable tags, sway bars, and many others, totaling over 50 tags.
